

P08. Literature, Heritage, and Tourism

Isabel Araújo Branco (CHAM, Universidade NOVA de Lisboa)

The cultural legacies of writers and works of literature, as well as the locations and landmarks connected to them, are referred to as literary heritage. This can include the writer's houses, museums, foundations, and other locations connected to authors and their works, as well as other kinds of built and natural heritage that could be associated. Visitors are frequently curious to explore the locations and learn more about the writers and texts that have shaped the perception of a particular region or country, therefore this literary history can play a significant role in promoting local heritage. Around the world, numerous towns and cities have created literary trails or itineraries that lead visitors to places connected to particular authors or literary works.

Additionally, literary legacy can benefit education and community involvement by giving locals a chance to learn more about the works, authors, and locations and by building a deeper respect for their own cultural heritage. The aim of this panel is to promote critical thinking on this subject matter by discussing the very concept of literary heritage, and its connections to history, tourism, geography, digital technology, and education.

Keywords: Literature; Heritage; Tourism; Literary Tourism.

Thematic Lines: Literary heritage; Literary Tourism; Cultural Tourism.

Organization:

Support:

Media Partner:

